Excerpt from The African Repository, and Colonial Journal, Vol. 7: September, 1831 No longer conscious that they are far behind those. With whom they dwell in the race. O! improvement, their efforts will be made with the hope and with the assurance of success. They will no longer be objects of charity, but dispensers of charity. They will no longer look to others as to their superiors, but be regarded themselves as superiors. They will discipline themselves while they teach others; and while others show them respect, they will acquire a character which ought to be respected. And is it possible that they can look abroad upon the wide field for usefulness, enterprise, and honour; which will be. Spread out before them in Africa, and remain insensible to the innumerable, the mighty motives it presents to arouse their faculties and inspire, them with noble sentiments? Is there nothing stirring in the hope of suppressing the slave trade, - so long the reproach of Christendom - the terror and curse of Africa - which has turned pale the features and...
