Excerpt from The Latter-Day Saints Millennial Star, Vol. 83: February 10, 1921 War to a point which made the great death inevitable. Uh happily for this View millions of men and women died in countries remote from all the fields of battle. Moreover, the town-dweller fared no better than the peasant, the white man than the black or yellow, the dweller among snows than the dweller in tropical jungles. The only immunity in all this slaying - and it was but relative - was enjoyed by the very young and the very old. For these, and for these alone, the monster seemed to have small appetite. Our medical correspondent discusses those conclusions which have been formulated. They are sufficiently vague to disarm criticism in advance. The compilers evidently lean to the View that exceptional conditions, mental, physical, or both, were created by the general upheaval of war and that these broke down human resistance to the attacking germ. A11 alterna tive View, that the germ acquired a new degree of virulence, must be set against this. Neither is by any means satisfactory; all that can be said of them is that they are the best within our knowledge. The mystery remains a mystery, and a vast field for research is presented to the scientific mind. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books.
