Condition: New. Publisher/Verlag: LAP Lambert Academic Publishing | This research examines the effects of an individuals attachment style, or ways of relating to others, and their level of employee engagement. One hundred and sixteen individuals from a variety of industries took part in an online survey. In addition to measuring their level of engagement, this research examined the participants&apos; attachment style across two dimensions, anxiety (low to high) and avoidance (low to high). The research confirmed the hypothesis: that individual&apos;s with a secure attachment (low on anxiety and avoidance) exhibited a statistically significant and higher level of engagement than those with an insecure (dismissing, fearful) attachment style. Secure employees express their positive beliefs (and act accordingly), supporting the organization&apos;s goals and outcomes. Insecure employees do not hold the same positive beliefs-either in themselves and/or in the organization-they misinterpret what the organization is asking of them, leading to decreased levels of engagement. This research represents an exciting next step in demonstrating the attachment theory&apos;s ability to broaden our understanding and scope of workplace relationships and employee engagement. | Format: Paperback | Language/Sprache: english | 124 pp.
