STUDIES ON THE RELATION OF THE LIVING CELLS TO TRANSPIRATION AND SAP-FLOW IN CYPERUS. I James Bertram Overton (with ONE Figure) Historical discussion Recent studies have revived with considerable vigor the doctrine that the presence of the living cells in the stem is necessary for the ascent of sap. The earlier evidence as to the necessity of living cells for sap-flow, as presented by Godlewski (15) and supported by Westermaier (41, 42) and Janse (16), was shown to be inadequate by Strasburger (30, 31) in a series of elaborate experiments, in which long portions of stems were killed with steam, hot water, and poisons, and the dead parts proved to be still capable of conduction. Several authors have refused to accept Strasburgers conclusions and have presented important criticisms of his experimental work. The vitalistic theory of sap-flow, as it may perhaps be called, has been vigorously exploited by Ursprung (32-37) and further supported by his student Roshardt (24). Ursprungs methods and conclusions, however, have in turn been severely criticized by Jost (17, 18), Dixon (912). and Czapek (7, 8). Ursprung conceives that the living cells of the stem either may function in keeping the vessels in a proper state for conduction, or else they may take a direct part in the elevation of the sap. He believes that their lifting power is the more important function in tall plants, but that in low herbaceous ones the living cells may keep the vessels in a proper...
