Excerpt from book: he muttered; and there s the sledge-hammer somewhere for Walters. Leaning himself against the door, he then applied his eye to a chink which admitted a dim view of the room within, lighted fitfully by the fire. CHAPTER II. What have we here ? A carrion death! Merchant of Venice, Act ii. Sc. 7- It was about this time that the stranger deemed it advisable to commence his retreat. The slight and suppressed sound of voices, which at first he had heard above in the conversation of the father and child, had died away. The stillness at once encouraged and warned him. He stole to th.3 front door, softly undid the bolt, and found the door locked, and the key missing. He had not observed that during his repast, and ere his suspicions had been aroused, his host, in replacing the bar, and relocking the entrance, had abstracted the key. His fears were now confirmed. His next thought was the window?the shutter only protected it half way, and was easily removed; but the aperture of the lattice, which only opened in part like most cottage casements, was far too small to admit his person. His only means of escape was in breaking the whole window; a matter not to be effected without noise and consequent risk. He paused in despair. He was naturally of a strong- nerved and gallant temperament, nor unaccustomed to those perils of life and limb which German students delight to brave; but his heart...
