Excerpt from New Hampshire Rural Towns Comparative Road Burdens and Road Services This report was written before the United States was at war. Now, everything must be subordinate to the war effort. Everything must be adjusted to a war economy. The income of the State Highway Department will be much reduced. For that reason and for lack of labor, new projects must be postponed. A first consideration in all road planning must be the possible use of roads for military purposes. However, it is believed that this report is still of value both for present use and for future planning. Road work will necessarily play a large part in the future readjustment to a peace economy. Clearly, it should not be used merely as made work to take up the slack in employment, but should be planned ahead to. Give the greatest and best return for the labor invested. To that end such considerations as are stressed in this report, especially in its first and last sections, are of great importance. Meanwhile one of the ever present problems, even more crucial in war time than in peace is that of taxation and tax adjustment For the rural areas by far the greatest tax burden almost the only tax directly felt - is the direct real estate tax and by far the chief variable element in this tax is the road costs. The parts of this report dealing with the distribution of road costs, both for maintenance and for construction costs, are therefore immediately and permanently applicable, although action on some of the recommendations may not be immediately possible. A word about the history of the work leading up...
