Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Star: The Story of an Indian Pony Their wealth consisted of their herds of horses - which the Western Indians obtained from the Mexicans after the Spanish had invaded Mexico - their lodges and the few appliances for camp life. They worshipped the God of nature, and the Great Spirit was their omnipotent Jehovah. They believed that death was a long journey to the Happy Hunting Grounds. They were grateful for the abundance of the earth - the sunshine, air, water, and all the blessings of nature - and believed that all should share them alike. For one to wish to monopolize any part of the earth was to them the manifestation of a grasping disposition. Often the men of the most influence and greatest popularity in the tribe were the poorest, or those who gave most to others.
