This is the sixth of a series of little books describing what life was like for a little girl in rural Vermont during the 1940s. The one-room school, the tar-paper hunting shack on the mountain, all the animals that were part of my growing up years, the people that made life what it was back then, the little chapel, the woods and meadows that graced my life and the backyard gardening that fed us throughout the year these I have written about in my earlier books. They were part of the 1940s Vermont I knew. Grampas and Grammas farm was a small dairy farm. Long before my time Grampa had a hired hand or two. Then as his sons and daughters grew, no hired hand was necessary. My mother, like most farm girls in her time, pitched in with the milking and plowing and the various other tasks of farming. She could harness and drive a team of work horses as well as any man. Time is a continuum, however, and gradually Grampas sons and daughters married and started families and careers of their own. Yet the family stayed together. All Grampas and Grammas children built their homes on the farms land. Grampa continued his farming, but on a smaller scale, and his sons pitched in on weekends and evenings as needed. Mama and her sister, young mothers with children and homes to attend, helped with the farm work only occasionally, such as meat processing at butchering time. That family farm tradition continued through my generation. My brother and boy cousins helped our Grampa with the farm work, though not with daily regularity. But whenever Grampa needed them, or if he...
