Excerpt from The Meistersingers, Wagner It is said that the last of these interesting survivals died in 1876. The Meistersingers had their origin in the early part of the fourteenth century, and their golden age was about the time of the Lutheran Reformation. A versifying mania had taken possession of the lower classes. As one historian puts it, blacksmiths, weavers, shoemakers, doctors, and schoolmasters sought to mend their fortunes by making verses. Companies of these persons formed themselves into guilds or corporations, calling themselves Mastersingers, and holding periodical gatherings at which they criticised each other's productions. They composed their verses in conformity with certain strict guild rules; accuracy, industry, and painstaking care, rather than an unfettered expression of the true Spirit of poetry, were the main features of the Mastersingers art.
