Excerpt from In London Town, Vol. 1 of 3: A Novel She had one near relation in the world, and only one, and that was a brother, many years older than herself. There had been a quarrel between Colonel Everest and him with regard to money matters, and she had taken her lover's part, and married him in spite of brotherly counsel. The Reverend Theophilus Burney was as ignorant of women as a man born of woman can be, but he was not nearly so much offended at his counsel being disregarded as he was grieved for his sister's fate. After the marriage he made an offer of reconciliation, but the new bride was too proud to let even his eyes see her humiliation, and she refused his offer coldly, whereupon it had not been renewed for Theophilus, though a clergyman, and a good man was but human, and the refusal angered him. She thought of this refusal as she sat with the open Times before her in her dismal lodging in London (the Colonel had not been lavish with regard to money matters). She told herself with a little fierce gesture that she would never go back to be pitied and condoled with, and even as she said it she thought with a sigh of the comfortable Devonshire rectory. Perhaps if time had been given her she would have gone back, with the words of the prodigal not on her lips, but in her heart; but time was not given her. The very day after the news of her husband's death was in the Times, a well-remembered footstep made a sound of stumbling on the steep London...
