There was something about the good-natured, lighthearted fellow, that took Blackburn s fancy, and when the next Saturday came round, he placed himself near the door and watched it anxiously to see if Davis would appear. He was not disappointed. Tom walked in, humming a tune, and that evening was spent much as the former one had been, except that Blackburn was foremost in filling the singer s glass, and in pressing for a song. Weeks passed thus, until one Saturday night, Davis glass having been filled once too often, he was incapable of leaving the place unassisted. Blackburn, who had drunk far more, but who had the stronger head of the two, offered to see him home. Instructed by the landlord, he took the young man by the arm, and half led, half dragged him down the street which led to his home. Davis at first allowed himself to be taken along without resistance, but when about half way to his destination, he stopped short, struggled to free himself, and said, in a thick voice, I say, p liceman, let me go this once. I m not a policeman, said Blackburn, with a laugh; I m a friend, taking you home; come along. You re not, stuttered Davis; you re taking me to gaol, to give me another five years. I won t go, I say. Here, help! help! One or two men ran up at his cries,...
