The View on the Wissahickon is one of the most thoroughly poetic little landscapes seen in this city of late years. Nothing could be more charming than the pose of the angler who gives a touch, a light but sufficient touch, of human interest to this romantic glimpse. Of a vale in which Izaak Walton himself, fresh from his beloved dale of the Dore, might have been happy. The lower atmosphere is exquisitely treated, and the brooding distance has a soft and natural luminousness.
