Not illustrated. 1908 Excerpt: .Eureka is being planted more than other varieties, as it matures a larger proportion of fruit in the spring and summer. There are a number of systems of pruning and training the lemon tree in use in California. In a general way they consist in shortening the wood, removing the strong-growing suckers, and thinning out the top when it becomes too dense. In a young tree the main branches, four or five in number, are started about 2 feet from the ground and should not be opposite each other. In general, the pruning for the first three or four years consists in cutting out or shortening to lateral buds the central upright leaders, in order to give the tree an open, laterally upward form. The strong main laterals are also headed in to make them stocky, but the finer fruit-bearing wood is not pruned. The lower branches of the tree are frequently cut back or removed, but should be allowed to develop untouched, as the first fruit that the tree produces is borne on them. These branches should be removed as the tree grows older and the top becomes more dense. Some of the growers do not prune the trees until they have been planted two or three years, when they begin to form the top somewhat after the manner described. As the trees grow older and the weight of fruit causes the branches to droop, the lateral growth is not often cut back, but the...
