Excerpt: .By measuring the fall thus produced, the pressure of the vapor of various liquids at different temperatures may be determined. Another way to illustrate the pressure exerted by the vapor, of a liquid is to pour a little of the liquid into a flask, so that it may evaporate into the air which the flask contains. If the flask is corked tightly as soon as the liquid is poured in, a considerable pressure may be generated. In fact, explosions sometimes occur from this cause. To measure the pressure, a tube may be passed through the cork into some mercury in the bottom of the flask (see Fig. 67), and the liquid should be injected by means of a medicine-dropper passing through the cork beside this tube, so as to avoid losing the pressure generated by evaporation before the cork can be put into its...
