Excerpt from The House of Harrison: Being an Account of the Family and Firm of Harrison and Sons, Printers to the King From time to time various accounts have been published of the work or the history of the firm of Harrison and Sons, compiled generally from information gathered by some interviewer or newspaper correspondent. The recollections of the late Mr. James William Harrison, extending over a period of eighty years, have always been particularly valuable as well as interesting, for during this period great progress and development have been made. We have thought that the many scattered references might well be collected and digested, and an authorized account of the Firm-be put forth. Shakespeare makes one of his characters say, Thou hast most traitorously corrupted the youth of the realm in erecting a grammar school; and whereas, before, our forefathers had no other books but the score and tally, thou hast caused printing to be used 3 and contrary to the King, his crown and dignity, thou hast built a paper mill. Times have changed since words like those could be...
