Not illustrated. 1853 Excerpt: .when, after Charles had retired, he saw the man approach the poultry yard, and lay his hand upon the wooden bolt. He began then to bark furiously, and even, it must be confessed, seized the lower end of his trowsers with such violence, as to tear out a piece of the cloth. Brute! exclaimed the enraged intruder, giving the animal a kick, which caused the poor beast to utter the most piercing cries. This act of revenge, however, was perhaps, in the end, the means of saving the faithful animal. The man himself thought he had, for the present, punished him sufficiently to make amends for the injury he had done. There is no knowing, however, how far he might have gone on any future occasion; but Charles, who ran out at the noise, chained him up for further security. Poor Caniche, who thought from this that he had committed a fault, when he was really fulfilling a duty, lay down before his kennel whenever the bailiff came afterwards to the Bankside, but not without casting upon him many a suspicious and angry glance. The cat, who had witnessed this scene, had leaped up to the top of the hut; and hereafter, whenever she saw poor Caniche shrink into his kennel, she always climbed upon the thatch, where she remained with half-closed eyes and her body coiled up, until the enemy had evacuated the field. The conduct of the bailiff was the subject of frequent conversation among...
