Her father, a Yakuza drug dealer. Together they dominated the hospitality industry of Sapporo. After the crushing of a fifty hour Japanese-style work week, the commodities they purveyed, practically sold themselves to weary executives. But did their illicit vocations play a role in an horrific Hokkaido syndicate murder? One of many children, sadly born in hotels each year to homeless parents, her life was destined to be one of upheaval from birth. Later, as a youth, diagnosed with terminal illness, traditional therapies were no longer deemed effective. So in a procedure of last resort, her doctors implemented a shocking and revolutionary stem cell protocol. This prolonged her life in profound ways. Enter the suspenseful and dark world of child abduction in the Asian underworld, drug-related death in war-torn Africa and Canadian Arctic expedition. For Sahara, geography and circumstance collide, jeopardizing not only her personal survival-but ultimately every woman on our planet. The science behind Sahara In the absence of disease, the human body has the capacity to live approximately one hundred twenty-two years. However, in the presence of health threats such as virus, cancer, diabetes or the occasional bad drug marketed by Big Pharma, eighty-five years is the higher end of the life expectancy spectrum for women. Men, statistically live several years less. Indeed, while some aspire to become leaders in politics or industry, we often lose sight of what one lofty fundamental human aspiration should be. That is, to live to be a centenarian while maintaining independence and presence of mind. However, two hundred years existence is not uncommon to some species already on earth. The Bowhead Whale-a mammal, has a...
