Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Each book in this series is complete and can stand alone. In this story, amnesia-stricken Roy Anderson believes himself to be a king over the local nursing home. He sees the staff as palace staff: butlers, maids, housekeeper, cook, scullery maids, chauffeur, etc. The residents are his people - some are nobility and some are not. But these are the citizens of his kingdom. As the establishment has fallen onto hard times and will have to close its doors soon, King Roy and Queen LeeAnn buy the nursing home, since Roy believes it to be his ancestral family castle, it having been constructed to resemble an old English castle. During his investigation and rule, he promotes various residents to unprecedented positions: royal secretary, royal press secretary, assistants to the royal court jester, royal gardeners and knights. He refers to the staff by titles such as: royal butler, royal housekeeper, and royal taste-tester, even calling the distinguished Chief of Staff simply by his sir name of Burke, believing him to be the head butler. The guards and orderlies are knights, while the doctors are dubbed titles of nobility: Duke, Duchess, and Viscount. Friends and families of the residents are referred to as visiting dignitaries. The local press is constantly hounding Roy for interviews. Since he is the only royalty the town lays claim to, the novelty of such an article is too great a temptation for them...
