THE IDEAL As, during convalescence, I lay in long days and nights of thought, the dreams which had come to me in the mountains and in the desert, and in the great inspired moments of life, came to me once more. I was just returning from the brink of death, and the ideas of a lifetime sorted themselves out in my mind. What was real and what was of value stood out in sharp distinctness; what was only of temporary utility or utterly valueless dropped away. I had had a full life, with many varied experiences--as soldier, explorer, journalist, diplomatist, administrator; in India, China, Central Asia, and South Africa, as well as in Europe; and among Hindus, Mohammedans, and Buddhists, as well as Christians. I had had the good fortune to belong to an altogether perfect home. I had had the bad fortune...
