Excerpt from A Summary of Progress in Mineralogy and Petrography in 1891 Water, and above this temperature is decomposed. Just below 260 the hydrate is biaxial, while above this temperature the anhydrous residue is uniaxial. Other zeolites yield similar results. These lead to the conclusion that they all consist of a nepheline, pyroxene, or feldspar-like silicate, combined with meta or orthosilicic acid, and also an amount of water varying with the temperature. The crystal water may be driven off at high temperature, and taken up again at a lower one, and the various hydrates obtained by the successive steps may possess different crystallographic properties. After a certain amount of loss the minerals refuse to part wrth more water, which is regarded as chemically combined with silica in the silicic-acid portion of the combination. The author determines incidentally the solubility of several of the zeolites in different solvents, and concludes his paper with a table giving the supposed composition of the members of the group. Heulandite is represented as natrolite as etc. Messrs. C. And G. Friedel, n by the action of lime on mica in the presence of calcium chloride, obtained small crystals of anorthite, and by the action of soda and sodium sulphate on the same mineral produced little prismatic crystals of a substance differing from nosean in the addition of two molecules.
