Excerpt from The Amateur Garden Street of residence, Elm Street, begins a gently winding westerly ascent to become an open high road from one to another of the several farming and manufacturing Villages that use the water power of Mill Elver But while it is still a street there runs from it southerly at a right angle a straight bit of avenue some three hundred yards long an exceptional length of unbent street for Northampton this short avenue ends at an other, still shorter, lying square across its foot within some seventy yards of that suddenly falling wooded and broken ground where Mill Elver linters through Paradise The strip of land between the woods and this last street is taken up by half a dozen dwellings of modest dignity, whose front shade-trees, being on the southerly side, have been placed not on the sidewalk's roadside edge but on the side next the dwellings and close within their hue of private ownership red, white and post-oaks set there by the present writer when he named the street Dryads Green They are now twenty-one years old and give a good shade which actually falls where it is wanted upon the sidewalk that suddenly falling wooded and broken ground where Mill Elver linters through Paradise.
