The arc welder must see as much as possible what is going on while the electrode is depositing metal in the weld. Protective lenses may be mounted in three ways. For inspection work a pair of close-fitting goggles is all that is necessary. They must be screened at the sides, because the invisible ultraviolet and infrared rays are reflected in the same way as visible rays. Goggles do not protect the operator as well as a hand screen. He can quickly lay this down when he has broken his arc and it gives him a ready means for viewing quickly his cooling metal. The screen covers his face and chest, giving him protection on all sides. Some operators claim a liking for the screen on the basis of its steadying quality; that is, by holding the left arm tightly pressed to the body gives added confidence to the movements of the right arm. Metallic arc welders rarely use a helmet, but in carbon arc welding this is necessary both for the added protection to the 1 Eye Protection in Iron-Welding Operations, W. S.
