Excerpt: . and spirited; they abound in striking situations and hold the attention well. The characters are brave, courteous, magnanimous, and of marked and interesting individuality. Although the dialogue is rather long and high-pitched, it accords with the elevated sentiments expressed, and at times is bright with courtly repartee. Most noticeable in the dialogue is the use of blank verse of such free movement as to give a conversational manner. There are many run-on lines and many loose, irregular lines, which, however they may be criticised according to the canons of versification, are nevertheless to be defended for dramatic use. The language is not heightened, as it was later in the heroic drama, but is natural. The most important characteristic of Carliell s work is its romanticism, which is seen, aside from the general tone, in the blending of the chivalrous romance and the pastoral....
