Excerpt from Report Chemist of the Chemist for 1904 The administration of boric acid to the amount of 4 or 5 grams per day, or borax equivalent thereto, continued for some time. Results in most cases in loss of appetite and inability to perform work of any kind. In many cases the person becomes ill and unfit for duty. For ur grams per day may be regarded then as the limit of exhibition beyond which the normal man may not go. The administration of 3 grams per day produced the same symptoms in many cases, although it appeared that a majority of the men under observation were able to take 3 grams a day for a somewhat protracted period and still per form their duties. They commonly felt injurious effects from the dose however, and it is certain that the normal man could not long continue to receive 3 grams per day. In many cases the same results, though less marked followed the administration of borax to the extent of 2 grams, and even of 1 gram, per day, although the illness following the administration of borax and boric acid in those proportions may be explained in some cases by other causes, chiefly grippe.
