In poetic form, it would lead to the use together of sounds allied rather than alike. For instance, b and m may be said to be allied, in the sense, too, of being consonant. They differ in that b has a preliminary sound, and p has none. But they are so nearly alike that the mind often confounds them, as is proved in the history of derivations; and so too does the ear, as is proved by the endeavor of a foreigner to imitate the pronunciation of a native word containing one of them. For the same reasons v and f also are allied and consonant; and so, though less clearly, are all four of these consonants--b, p, v, and f. The same thing may be affirmed of d and t, of th (hard), and th (soft), and of all four; also of k...
