Forgotten Books, 2017. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Experiments on the Supposed Deterioration of Varieties of Vegetables in Porto Rico With Suggestions for Seed Preservation Vegetable gardening in Porto Rico is a small industry and one in which there has been little progress for many years. Aside from the culture Of tomatoes, Okra, beans, pigeon peas, and starchy root crops, which are grown as horticultural crops, the farm garden is seldom seen. The commercial gardens are few and small and devoted to the culture Of few vegetables, these Often Of inferior type. The poor development Of the vegetable industry results from the unfavorable soil and climatic conditions, a lack Of knowledge regarding the value of the best varieties and concerning good seed and its storage, and the production of seed at home. There is a belief that northern-grown vegetables degenerate quickly in Porto Rico and that the seed from even the first generation produces plants which are inferior to their parents. This belief results partly from the common practices in vegetable growing. On account of the heavy summer rains, the crops which are grown from seed are for the most part planted in the fall or winter. If seed harvested from these plantings is immediately sown, the plants as a rule give poor results, as they must contend with heavy rains, intense heat, and other unfavorable conditions. The unsatisfactory development and yield Of the plants are naturally but unfairly attributed to the rapid degeneration of the seed resulting from the effect of the tropical climate. Because of the high humidity, seed deteriorates rapidly in the Tropics if exposed to the open air, and, therefore, much of the seed Offered for sale by local dealers is almost valueless. Imported seed is Often...
