Excerpt from The City of the Golden Gate: A Description of San Francisco in 1875 Never was there a more unsightly spot for a city. A long ragged peninsula, mottled with mammoth sand dunes, over which swept the sharp Winds and chilling fogs of summer, and pitiless storms of winter; isolated from the main-land, barren, verdureless horrid to the eye, with the broad Pacific dashing its waves against it on one side, and a stormy inland sea beating upon it on the other - no wonder the heart of the pioneer sunk within him as he gazed upon the inhospitable wilds for the first time. It was no less uninviting in its social aspect. An old church, and a cluster of adobe huts at the Mission; a lot of wretched rookeries at the Presidio; a few hide and tallow ware: houses on the beach - that was all. The population was made up of Greasers, Digger Indians, a few white traders, deserters from whale ships, and adventures of no nationality in particular, the whole numbering a few hundred souls. Its very name, yerba buena, was strange to American ears. Yet it was manifest to the sharp observer that nature had intended the place for a great city. Nearly twenty years before the first Argonaut had planted his foot upon its site, Captain Bonneville, the famous explorer, predicted that here would rise one of the great marts of commerce and naval stations of the world. The Bay of San Francisco is a vast inland sea. It has an extreme length of over seventy miles, a mean width of ten miles, and a circumference if we include San Pablo and Suisun bays, which...
