Thus ended this ill-conceived union between Pitt and Addington, which was disliked by the friends of both, and which, beyond Leing approved of by the king, resulted in no advantage to the premier. Foreign affairs were now engrossing all the attention of the prime minister. By a certain treaty--that of St. Ildefonso--concluded at the close of the eighteenth century, Spain had covenanted to furnish a stated contingent of naval and military forces for the prosecution of any war in which France might think fit to engage. This covenant was now being carried out by the Spanish rulers, who not only furnished the new Emperor of the French with ample funds but were busy preparing considerable armaments in the Spanish ports for his service. England remonstrated with much moderation, and when remonstrances had proved useless sent a squadron to the coast of Spain. At the sight of our fleet the government of Madrid, however, declined to be intimidated, and orders were then issued by Pitt for the I have ever thought, writes the second Lord Malmcsbnry in his Diary, that an abiding cause of Pitts death, certainly one that tended to shorten his existence, was the result of the proceedings against his old friend and colleague Lord Melville. I sat wedged close to Pitt himself the night when we were 216 to 216, and the speaker (Abbot), after looking as white as a sheet, and pausing for ten minutes,...
