The only way in which she gives vent to her disappointment and vexation, is by expressing, while she gives Edward and Perceval their luncheon, a doubt which she does not feel, whether you mean to come down at all. By the way, the boys are very assiduous at chess; and Edward, who you know is sanguine, conceives that you could no longer afford to give him a queen. In the mean time he practises on Ilfortimer; who, having played the game well for half an hour, gets weary and inattentive, and having lost all the ground that he had gained, calls on me to succeed him, and repair his errors. Against this, Edward protests loudly, maintaining that to abdicate is to give in. We always decide for him,...
