Excerpt: . . . 15, and 20 per cent, below the fair letting value. I have before me at this moment the rental and valuations of about a dozen farms in one of the best English counties, and the difference in favour of the tenant is upwards of 30 per cent. There is hardly a large estate in England on which numerous cases would not be found of similar cheapness of rent. Even under the system of leases such as prevail in Scotland, the preference given to old tenants is often veily large. On many estates the farms, except in the case of real vacancies, are never subjected to competition at all. This is universally the case with the whole class of small tenants who come under the category of peasant holders, and whose rents are generally very cheap. Even in respect to the possessions held by capitalists,...
