Excerpt: .Yet this very able, and, with some exceptions, very virtuous man, merited a much better character, than the speaker has vouchsafed him. His sound principles in politics, without reference to party, his scrupulous integrity, and unremitting attention to the interests of the poor, ought to have been recollected. To return to the duchess of Somerset; a curious account of the manner in which it was attempted by those about the queen's person to keep the duchess from her, is given in a pamphlet entitled The Detection, c. and quoted by Oldmixon in his Hist. of these Reigns, p. 537. Her majesty's esteem for the duchess of Somerset was such, that she not only continued her in her post of groom of the stole, but frequently sent for her, especially in the time of her illness; and having done this once or twice in this juncture, the message was not delivered: and when the lady came of herself to visit the queen, she was received with some coldness, and expostulated with about the reason of her non-attendance. The truth was soon found out, that no message was delivered to the duchess, but the excuses made for it were admitted; yet the queen, from henceforward, when she wrote to the duchess at Petworth, or elsewhere remote from her, sent her letter by a particular messenger to the post-office, and always required a receipt for the delivery of...
