Excerpt from August the Fourth, 1914, in the Belgian Parliament There were, nevertheless, a few persons in diplomatic circles who continued to hope against hope that Germany would recoil before the consummation of the crime. The awakening of England and the firmness of the Belgian reply seemed to these optimists, unfamiliar with German mentality, factors which might bring about a change of front at Berlin. As the day wore on, they noted joyfully that no act of aggression had followed upon the receipt of the Belgian note. But the military element cherished no illusions. After consulting the Minister of War by telephone, General Leman ordered the destruction of the railways and bridges, the use of which Germany had already demanded, and the demolition of numerous buildings in the neighbourhood of Liege which would have obstructed the fire from the forts. In the evening the deputies poured into Brussels from every corner of Belgium, bearing with them an echo of the unanimous determination of the country to defend itself to the end.
